Will ENERGY STAR Most Efficient Windows become the norm? (Dual Pane vs. Triple Pane)

Most Efficient 2016

I bet you just got used to hearing about double pane, Low-E glass, Argon filled windows. You know the ones. The dual pane ones labeled as ENERGY STAR? Now, there is a new babe in town getting a lot of attention from the Department of Energy. The ENERGY STAR Most Efficient window has all the right curves and significant energy savings compared to its distant cousin, the ENERGY STAR window. Yep, this ENERGY STAR Most Efficient is energy efficient beauty with triple panes of either high solar-gain, Low-E Glass, Argon/Krpton Gas or high solar-gain, Low-E Glass, Argon/Krpton Gas, depending on your area of the country. According to the DOE;

"Common ENERGY STAR windows only have an R-value of 3. Increasing the R-value from 3 to 5 reduces average heat loss through the windows by 40% and saves consumer money on energy bills."

But why are the ENERGY STAR Most Efficient windows the darlings of the DOE?;

"Windows in the U.S. account for 30% loss of building heating and coolingenergy, representing an annual impact of 4.1 quadrillion Btu (quads) of primary energy. Windows have an even larger impact on peak energy demand and on occupant comfort."

"So, why isn't everyone jumping on the ENERGY STAR Most Efficient bandwagon? Cost versus energy efficiency."
